It seems partners are much more flexible with associates who have kids than with those who don't. If it's okay for my colleague with a kid to leave at 5 pm and log on later, why isn't that the same for me (no kids)? My obligations might be different, but I still have a life and want to be able to do certain things, like catch that evening workout class or cook dinner for my partner. As you can probably tell, my firm is operating 100% in person. There is no point here — I'm just whining.

New Partner. My other partners want to change benefits and perks around to attract more young talent - I need to brainstorm ideas. What great thing does a company offer that makes you want to work there (besides compensation obviously)?

Can we start naming firms that are expecting associates to go back to the office five days a week with no wfh flexibility? And which firms are allowing associates to wfh with more flexibility post-pandemic? I hoped there would be a change to the general biglaw face time requirement but seems like some firms are going right back to 2019 standards.

Pros

Some very understanding coworkers and leaders, let me work at home on off days or with personal situations. Some opportunities to move up in company.

Cons

Supervisor had some micromanagement over me and team, created strain at first, then got better over time, better feelings. Noticed other employees were very passive aggressive with attitude in chats/emails that was unnecessary.

Pros

If you like to be left alone and not spoken to very often, this job might be for you. People keep to themselves and hardly make conversation here.

Cons

This is a family run and conservative law firm. There is a weird awkward culture here of non-inclusion and back-stabbing. The (new) management is anti-social and refuses to even make eye contact with some of his employees. There is little to no room for growth, and instead of being offered raises they choose to offer unhealthy snacks as reward for your "great job". You will have way more work than is worth what you get paid.

Is there no major bank that offers Authenticator apps 2fa .to protect against sim swap theft?
All the banks seem to use SMS or fallback to sms if authentication doesn't work. In contrast, brokerage firms usually use Authenticator apps.
